

Support Services

Quality of Life Specialist:

Assist in effective palliative care intervention not only during treatment, but equally important after treatment. Survivors face a variety of physical, social, psychological, financial, and spiritual issues during treatment and sometimes for the rest of their lives. Quality of Life specialists support survivorship needs as the person defines them, to lessen the negative effects of cancer and its treatment, and to improve the quality of their lives. Cancer survivors are the “experts of themselves,” in regards to how they define “living well” and effective palliative care expertise can assist the person in their own unique journey to receive the best care possible.

Oncology Social Worker:

Provides a broad spectrum of social work services to patients, families and caregivers facing the impact of a cancer diagnosis and treatment. The social worker performs psycho-social navigation along the disease continuum working with a multidisciplinary team which includes financial and nurse navigators. The social worker promotes development of coping strategies and mobilization of community resources to support optimal functioning and quality of life. The social worker performs an evaluation of needs, individual and group counseling, crisis intervention, case management and advocacy services and collaboration with the health care team.

Behavioral Health:

Behavioral health is a multidisciplinary healthcare team that specialize in treating the whole person. Surviving cancer is more than overcoming physical challenges. The stress of managing the diagnosis and treatment also takes emotional strength. Adjusting to life after treatment can be helped by the coaching and support of a counselor.
